"Drew's knowledge and expertise of art and antiques is fantastic." - Allen Bakalian, Little Falls

"It sure was a Godsend having PPC. We trusted you both and you came through and that has helped make a difficult time better." - Joan Padley, New York

Fine Art Investment, Part 2

If your faith in the stock market has grown stale over the years, perhaps you may find enjoyment investing in art. Perhaps you find pleasure in the treasure hunting process or excitement in buying and selling for profit. Your answer may determine the educational methodology you should employ.

Visiting galleries in person is great fun, but for investment purposes, one may need to employ more efficient educational methods as well.

First, decide on what type of art will fit your lifestyle. Consider your physical space requirements. Do you have room for bronzes or are miniatures more appropriate?

Second, consider the size of your investment. Are you comfortable with a minor percentage of your assets in the art market or are you interested in establishing a more important collection?

As with any financial instrument, a good broker can be instrumental. He or she can advise you of the market's nuances and help you to define and establish your collection.

Subscribe to your favorite auction catalogs and look at their results (often available in lot listing format online). You will begin to get a feel for this market, just like reading the Wall Street Journal.
